Individual supervising teachers have shared their concern in the DRC over the insistence on the part of the University Administration that they sign ~~on~~ the individual bills of the contingency bills/vouchers submitted by the research scholars working with them. They will only forward the bills with their signature. As the expenses incurred are committed by the scholars themselves, the supervising teachers cannot be made accountable for the expenses. For the last four years the supervising teachers have not been made accountable for the same. Hence the supervising teachers strongly feel that the earlier practice be continued.

LEC 5007 Diaspora Literature

Course Description

The course examines the diasporic conditions like feelings of homelessness, alienation, the desire to reclaim their ideal homeland while revolting against it by analysing the Diasporic writings which express their condition of being psychically caught between two locations and this double marginalization by both their home culture and their host culture challenges their belonging to either location. It helps how writers manage heteroglossia, hybridity and linguistic experimentation within the narrative techniques and how by taking up issues of race, ethnicity, belonging, otherness (as well as 'othering') gender, subalternity etc. construct diaspora discourses. The course tries to understand how the diaspora forestall their yearning to go back to overcome their inability to move out, and their urge for solidarity with homeland by their unwillingness to challenge the hostland. As this course is comparative and interdisciplinary in nature, it draws on social sciences, history, the arts and humanities. It provides the background to the subject area from diverse perspectives and introduces students to a range of key debates in the field.
