Individual supervising teachers have shared their concern in the DRC over the insistence on the part of the University Administration that they sign ~~on~~ the individual bills of the contingency bills/vouchers submitted by the research scholars working with them. They will only forward the bills with their signature. As the expenses incurred are committed by the scholars themselves, the supervising teachers cannot be made accountable for the expenses. For the last four years the supervising teachers have not been made accountable for the same. Hence the supervising teachers strongly feel that the earlier practice be continued.

LEC 5018 Malayalam Literature in Translation

The concept of 'regional literatures' has gained currency in the postcolonial, subaltern and Dalit debates that foregrounded the hitherto neglected literary cultures within the academic space of the English Departments across India during 70s. With the emergence of cultural studies in the 90s, however, regional literatures assumed a novel significance as they provided material for new insights into the functioning, traditions, modalities and significations of the regions. The relevance and import of such an attempt has never been in doubt since the boundaries of the region were increasingly seen as ever expanding. This also gave rise to the region-specific studies that argued that the colonial, Euro- centric or nation-centered literary as well as historic analyses might need a rethinking as they no more could be applied to region-specific literary and historic events, texts and movements. The course in question, while making texts written in Malayalam available in English, to a wider readership, attempts to situate Kerala's regional writing in the context of the regional studies and scholarship from across India. The new modalities now available for critically examine regional texts would hopefully help the cause of generating serious academic engagement and scholarship on regions and their literary cultures. The classical language status that Malayalam has been accorded with throws open newer avenues of better visibility and engagement for texts and their contexts emanating from Kerala.
